Brexit warning: Emmanuel Macron and Angela Merkel could harm Europe

Over the next few months as the second phase of Brexit negotiations begin, the European Union will fight tooth and nail over how the UK should leave the Brussels bloc.

Although many in the EU believe they won the first round after Theresa May agreed to stump up the €45 billion divorce settlement, the reality is that Brexit will still leave a huge hole in the budget.

And Angela Merkel and Emmanuel Macron have been warned they could risk economic disaster if they continue to push Britain into a corner.

Unlike Donald Trump's America, the UK and its government are not ripping up climate change accords or cancelling on nuclear deals.

In fact, Britain still remains committed to many EU laws, which have been enshrined in UK law.

Although the split is inevitable, Britain wants to stay 'aligned' to the bloc in what Philip Hammond calls the “extraordinary levels of interconnectedness” between the EU and UK.

But the Franco-German approach seems to hope for a clean break up – potentially causing unnecessary damage across Europe.

Officials in Berlin have dismissed the British idea of “managed divergence” as “the latest episode in the ‘cake and eat it’ sitcom series”.

And although the UK wants to leave the single market and customs union, forcing Britain to start trade negotiations from scratch is viewed as an aggressive move from the EU which in turn could cause damage to its own members.

France and Germany have long shared a strong partnership on European Union issues, with Chancellor Angela Merkel putting fellow leader Emmanuel Macron’s plans for EU reform at the centre of her coalition talks.

French MEP Jean Arthuis claimed Ms Merkel could push for an even stronger alliance should she succeed in forming a majority government after leaving Germany without formal leadership for months.

Speaking to Euronews, Mr Arthuis said: “If this grand coalition is formed, I think it will be favorable to Europe.

“Strengthening the Franco-German relationship will be good. Also beyond the partnership to the rest of the European partnership.”

Officials in Berlin have dismissed the British idea of “managed divergence”

Ukip leader Henry Bolton said: “The intransigence of Chancellor Merkle and President Macron over movement to stage two Brexit negotiations only will only disrupt commerce between the UK.

“They are simply holding out for more money and commitments from Britain.

“Any British government that goes along with this German/French agenda will be betraying UK interests.

“The government must be clear in its purpose - the pursuit of British interests. Those interests are not served by cow-towing to the agenda of Merkle but by pursuing our own.”
