

Separatist group claims deadliest day in recent history in Pakistan's Balochistan and threatens more violence

800 of the BLA's fighters reportedly took part in the bombings and shootings

A separatist group claimed responsibility Tuesday for the deadliest day in recent history in Pakistan's Balochistan and warned that "even more intense and widespread" attacks were coming, while the prime minister declared there would not be peace talks with the insurgents who also have targeted Chinese-funded projects there.

The multiple attacks in southwestern Pakistan killed more than 50 people, mostly civilians. The outlawed Balochistan Liberation Army group insisted it did not harm civilians and claimed that 800 of its well-trained fighters took part in the shootings and bombings that began late Sunday.

The attacks indicate that the BLA, which has targeted security forces for years in small-scale attacks and is allied with the Pakistani Taliban, is now much more organized.
