Greetings from Tyler,

The hearings are not going well for the little doctor. His coworkers, some of whom thought the Covid virus was engineered in a lab, were shut out of meetings according to sworn testimony before Congress. Others who expressed their professional opinions that the virus could not have sprung from nature, got grants and millions in funding. Soon, they did a 180 degree turn. The little guy must be apoplectic that this has been aired publicly. There are probably conference calls where everyone tries to get their stories straight. Hopefully, it all comes out.

If you haven't heard the speech Trump gave at the C-PAC gathering, I recommend it. When you search for it online you'll get Jimmy Kimmel and the View's take, and it'll make you mad. What is it with these search engines that bring up negative results about what you're looking for? Anything about Trump, and the mainstream just sneers. Careful how you search, or you'll come up with "pack of lies." Sure, the guy exaggerates for effect, but then we realize that's what is going on and find it enjoyable. Unless you just hate him, his vision of America moving forward is pretty inspiring, and often funny.

Apparently the Silicon Valley Bank has gone under. A financial guru (who I never watch) advised his viewers to buy stock in the Silicon Valley Bank one month ago. That was about the time when the principals were bailing out. Now the bank has gone bust. How can he keep a career in financial advice going? With any luck, he can't. Will there be a contagion that rips through other financial institutions? You can't be on the internet without coming across all kinds of urgent financial warnings. Today's Drudge Report features a headline with a hundred dollar bill on fire.

Checking on the news requires that you brace yourself. Saudi Arabia is burying the hatchet with Iran, in negotiations brokered by the Chinese. That would seem to complicate matters.

The news from Ukraine doesn't look encouraging. We still don't have definitive proof as to who blew up the Nord Stream 2 pipeline. If it was done by the U. S.

without Germany's permission, things might get very complicated.

I personally don't believe what most news is telling us. You see the January 6 footage that has recently been released, and you see that people were reverently sight-seeing in the Capitol. We see the so-called Q-anon shaman being escorted down hallways by police. He was facing 20 years, and was intimidated into accepting four, apparently without the benefit of the video we've all seen. It looks as though we've got a full court press against everything we hold dear. They've been deceiving everybody they can, and call the rest of us a lot of names.

A couple of years ago my friend Murray Allatt told me that they were detonating perfectly good power plants in Australia. Well, the trend has reached the U. S. The public better not let this happen but that is apparently what's planned, starting in New Mexico. It's green or bust. We all know that these planet-saving energy sources are iffy at best. But the green buffoons want to make sure there's no going back. This should be interesting!

We hope that the U. S. can survive the onslaught, but who knows? There's going to be hell to pay for the many lies, the outright deception of those who purport to inform us.

Mark
